SYMPOSIUM ON NATIVE RELIGIOUS TRADITIONS

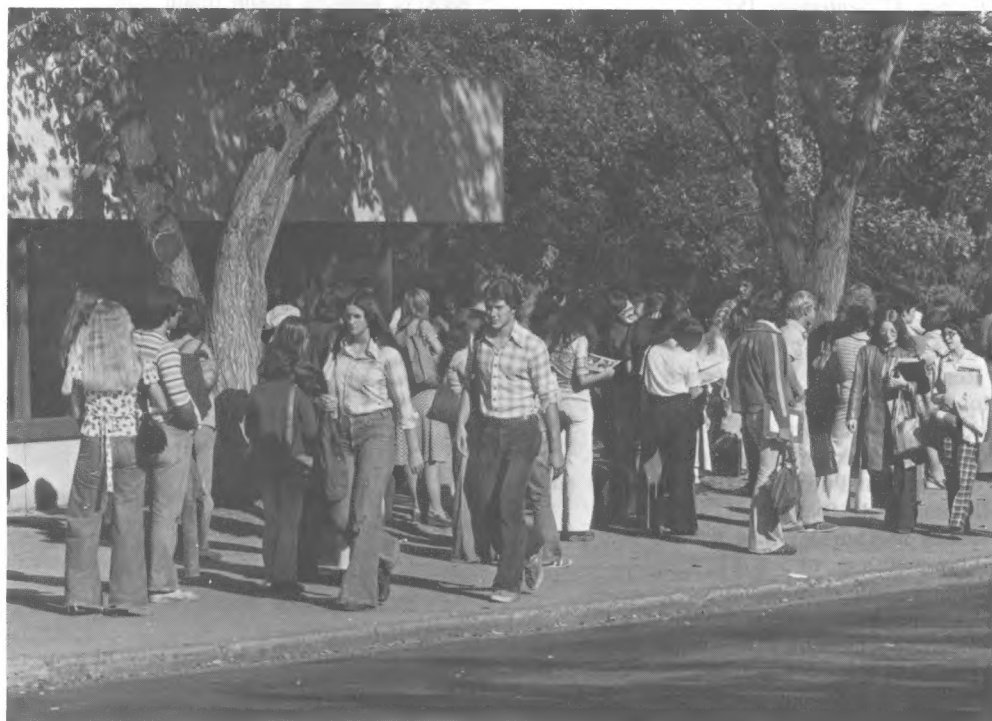

A symposium on native religious traditions will be conducted at the University from 15 to 17 September. About one hundred native elders and scholars will attend the symposium which is sponsored by the University's Department of Religious Studies. The goal of the symposium is to bring together the two groups so that a meaningful exchange of opinion may take place.

The symposium was organized to coincide with the centenary commemoration of Treaty No. 7, a treaty which recognized native culture as a vital and continuing element of Canadian culture. Participants will examine native religion and culture as well as mythology and ritual. The symposium will be held in University Hall and Education North.

During the morning sessions scholars will present papers. After each paper has been reviewed by another scholar, the audience will be asked to comment. Papers to be presented include: "Myth in native North American religions," by Ake Hultkrantz of the University of Stockholm; "The immediacy of mythological message: Native American traditions," by Joseph Brown, University of Montana; "An approach to Navajo mythology," by Karl Luckert of Northern Arizona University; and "The universe at prayer: a discussion of the Sacred Pipe Ceremony of the Ojibwas," by J.W.E. Newbery, Laurentian University, Sudbury, Ontario.

The elders will conduct the afternoon sessions. They will discuss a variety of issues pertaining to native religion. Among the elders who will participate in the symposium are Abe Burnstick, Cree; John Snow, Stoney; Ed Bad Eagle, Piegan; Joe and Beatrice Poor Eagle, North Blackfoot; and Tom Porter, Six Nations.

An exhibition of contemporary native art and a ceremonial pow wow, organized in conjunction with the Native Students' Association, will be held with the symposium. The exhibition is at the University Art Gallery from 6 to 25 September and features the work of Daphne Odjig, Alex Janvier, and Norval Morrisseau. The pow wow is to take place in the Strathcona High School Gymnasium, 10450 72 Avenue, at 7 p.m. on 17 September. Everyone is welcome.

The fee structure for the symposium is $35 for participating delegates, $20 for observers, and $10 for students. Further information may be obtained by contacting Earle Waugh, Department of Religious Studies, telephone 432-2174.
